Although you can still use Photoshop 8 and above with one of the various plugin add-ons from other makers, including Boris FX, the latest update brings with it an officially supported plugin for Photoshop's External Design engines; Plug-ins with Adobe Origin; and Plug-ins with ClearCanvas. It also adds support for external design engines, Corel Photopaint, Lightroom, and Boris FX plugins. You can read a comparison of various external engines here. - A new feature is Drive Snap, which helps you to keep your track of your images while taking them. While still beta, you can take your photo with the Takes a Snap Camera and with a push of a button your partial or full sequence will be taken. There is also a brand-new option to save your images as composited files, meaning that you can simply save your original image as a PSD file. You'll be able to merge the image with an image with transparency without having to export multiple files. While there is currently no official timeline for when this feature will be available, I believe that mobile users will likely see this feature before Windows users. But with the new software still in beta, it's unlikely that this will be ready for the time of the official release.

For those who have not yet joined the 3D revolution, it might be hard to understand the pain involved in creating 3D. Additionally, many professionals are becoming accustomed to using their image and graphics editing software to 3D workflows. This can mean the difference between a creative client's love affair with his or her 3D models and their demise. Adobe's latest acquisition of ILM and Pixologic means expanding the 3D workflow to include workers from other creative disciplines who want to shift their work flow to encompass 3D. Designers and other storytellers can now create and share 3D content seamless with Photoshop, enabling clients to consume the visions of their team members and editors with ease. A lot of professionals have been using a customized, file-based workflow just to build their 3D models. So the question is, "Is this state-of-the-art workflow going to be obsolete?" That's the question posed by the creative industry. With Photoshop's latest Java 3D support, designers who have relied on file-based 3D can now create 3D content seamlessly across Photoshop, CINEMA 4D, and the other stylizing applications that enable them to work restlessly in 3D. By offering native GPU-accelerated real-time video compositing, Adobe can now serve a near endless stream of fully-realized, user-customizable 3D worlds in the CINEMA 4D applications. It is now possible to create, edit, and tweak 3D content in a collaborative way. By updating CINEMA 4D to share the native GPU-accelerated compositing performance of the GPU with Photoshop, workflows are now greatly improved. Now designers can share 3D content in a multi-user, state-of-the-art fashion.
