Q: Redirecting a page with a query string to another page in ASP.NET I am using ASP.NET and want to redirect from a page to another page in ASP.NET and the above page must carry a query string with it. I have tried the following. `Response.Redirect("MyPage.aspx?ID=1");` and `Response.Redirect("MyPage.aspx?ID=1");` and `Response.Redirect("MyPage.aspx?ID=1");`; `Response.Redirect("MyPage.aspx");`; however none of them work.

A: Your first attempt is correct. It should work fine, but if it does not then check if you have other code in the page that you have not mentioned.

A: If you are using .NET 4.0, you should be able to do this: `Response.Redirect("MyPage.aspx?ID=" + id);` This is true for all .NET versions.

A: Try something like this: `Response.Redirect("MyPage.aspx?ID=" + id);` As a way of ensuring that the food that we eat is safe to eat, the food industry is required to ensure that they keep the maximum amount of bacteria out of the food they produce and the food they sell. As an example, large quantities of meat are 'washed' to ensure that bacteria is no longer present. This is called bacteriological analysis or sanitizing. It is important that both bacteriological analysis and the sanitizing process are complete. A tool and process that could verify that a food process was complete would be very useful for the safety and hygiene of the food we eat.

Age-related changes in blood volume and blood and plasma protein concentrations in mice: implications for assay methods. In the present study, evidence was provided indicating a decreased red cell volume with age in mice. This prompted a study of plasma volume and plasma protein concentrations as well as blood volumes in two strains of mice. Some strain differences were seen in plasma protein concentrations, and these were attributed to strain differences in
